Private Conversation

Lyle Lovett

And his hand it fell behind her As his arm it reached around And she looked at the window And she watched the shade go down

It was a private conversation No one heard her say That the man she left behind her Was two thousand miles away

Singing boy pick up that fiddle And play that steel guitar And find yourself a lady And dance right where you are

There was a lonely girl from nowhere With a smile all sweet with pain And she never stopped to wonder If she'd see him again

It was a private conversation
No one heard her say
That man that she was looking for
Was only twenty streets away

Singing boy pick up that fiddle And play that steel guitar And find yourself a lady And dance right where you are

And the band it just kept playing As she came walking in And he never stopped to wonder If he'd see her again

It was a private conversation No one heard him say That girl he left behind him Was two thousand miles away

He just sang boy pick up that fiddle And play that steel guitar And find yourself a lady And dance right where you are

And the moral of this story
Is I guess it's easier said than done
To look at what you've been through
And to see what you've become

It's a private conversation
No one hears you say
It's a private conversation

And his hand it fell behind her As his arm it reached around And she looked at the window

And she watched the shade go down

It was a private conversation

No one heard her say

It was a private conversation

No one heard him say

It was a private conversation

No one heard her say

It was a private conversation
